POACHING AS A FINE ART

The Ways and Methods of a Class Peculiar to Old England

Alone.

The Intelligent Poacher Always a Naturalist, Who Knows

All the Signs.

The Difficulty Lies Not in Obtaining the Game, But in Safely Getting it Home.

Posching is one of the fine arts-how 'fine" only the initiated know; and the successful poacher is always a specialist, says the London Spectator. He selects one kind of game, and his whole knowledge of woodcraft is directed against it. In autumn and winter, the man who devotes himself to "fur" knows the whereabouts of every hare in the parish-not only the field in which it is, but the very clump of rushes in which is its "form." As puss goes away down the tanght him much ready animal ingenuity. He has imbibed an immense amount of knowledge of the life of the fields and woods; and he is that one man in a thousand who has accuracy of eye and judgment sufficient to interpret nature aright.

In summer, poachers make and repair their nets for winter use. Large hair nets are made for gates, smaller ones for rabbit burrows and "smoots." Partridge nets are also necessarily large, having, sometimes to cover half a field. Although most of the summer the poacher is practically idle, it is at this time that he closely studies the life of the fields and makes his observations for winter. He gets occasional employment at hay or his profession treasures up what he sees. He is often introduced to the heart of the land, and misses nothing when he gets an opportunity. In autumn he is engaged to cut down ash poles or to fell young woods, and this brings him to the covert. Nothing escapes his notice, and in the end his employers have to pay dearly for his labor. At this time pheasants, and partridges are breeding, and are therefore worthless; so with rabbits and hares. But when game is "out," fish are "in." He knows the "deeps" where the fish most congregate, and there throws in chloride of lime. Soon the trout of the good float belly uppermost, and are lifted out, dazed, in a landing net. Many of the old poachers, however, discountenance this cowardly method, for by it, quite irrespective of size, the destruction of fish is whole sale. The old hands rather prefer to use of fashioned nets. To prevent this species of ponching, stakes are driven into the trout stream beds; but they are not of much avail. When it is known that a "reach" is staked a third man wades behind the nead lifts it over. The older generation of poachers, who have died or are fast dying out, seem to have taken the recipe of preparing salmon roe with them, for this once deadly bait is now rarely used.

Every poacher knows that the difficulty lies not so much in obtaining the game as in transporting it stelly home eadly bait is now rarely used.

Every poscher knows that the difficulty in transporting it safely home. Their dogs are always trained to run on a couple of hundred yards in advance, so as to give warning of any one's approach. If a police constable or keeper is met on the highway, the dog immediately leaps the fence, and, the dog immediately leaps the fence, and, under its cover, runs back to its master. Seeing this, the game bag is dropped into a dry ditch, and dog and man make off in different directions. County constables loiter about unfrequented lanes and bypaths at daybreak. The poachers know this, and are rarely met with game upon them. Ditches, stacks, and ricks afford good hiding places until women can be sent to fetch the spoil. These failing, country good finding places until women can be sent to fetch the spoil. These failing, country carriers and early morning milk carts are useful to the poacher. In one sleepy vil-lage known to us, both the postman and purish cierk were poachers. The latter car-ried his game in the black bag which usually held the funeral pall. The smith at the sheeing force was a regular receiver. the shoeing forge was a regular receiver, and there were few in the village who had not poached at some time or other. The cottage women netted fish, and shut their garden gates on hares and rabbits when they came down to seed in winter. Upon one occasion, a poacher, taking advantage of a country funeral, had himself and large haul taken to the nearest market town, the hearse disgorging its questionable corpse behind the nearest game shop. Another of the poachers, nicknamed "The Gentleman," was wont to attire himself in broad-brimmed hat and black coat, similar to those worn a century ago by the Quakers. In the former he carried his nets, and in the capacious pockets of the latter the game he ook. These outward guarantees of good rick, or outhouse. As to the poacher's morality with regard to the game laws, it is difficult to detect just where he draws the line. He lives for these to be repealed, and yet his native philosophy tells him that when this time comes game will have become well nigh extinct. Upon the ground game act he looks with mingled feelings; for, after all, are not rabbits and hares the chief products of his nights? The farmers now get these, and the poacher's field is limited. They engage him, maybe, to stay the ravages upon clover and young wheat, or to thin the rabbits from out the postures. The poacher propitiates the farmer in many ways. Occasionally, in the morning, the farm lad finds half adorements. The poacher propitiates the farmer in many ways. Occasionally, in the morning, the farm lad finds half a dozen rabbits or a hare dropped behind the barn door. How these came there no one knows nor asks. The country attorney is sometimes submitted to a like indignity. In crossing land the poacher is careful 'to close gates after him, and he never breaks down fences. He assists cattle and sheep which he finds in extremity, and leaves word of the mishap at the farm. Is it likely that the farmer will dog the steps of the man who protects his property and pays toil for doing it?

Is it likely that the farmer will dog the steps of the man who protects his property and pays toil for doing it?

It frequently happens that the poacher is

It frequently happens that the poacher is not less popular with those whose interests he more directly serves. It is even asserted that more than one of the county justices have in some sort a sneaking affection for him. The same wild spirit and love of sport take him to the fields and woods as his more fortunate brethren to the moor and convert. It is untrue, as has been said, shis more fortunate brethren to the moor and convert. It is untrue, as has been said, that every peacher is a mercenary wretch who invertably sells his game. He as frequently sends in a brace of birds or a hare to a poor or sick neighbor. He comes in contact with the law just sufficient to know something of its bearings. When charged with being in pose soton of "game," he reliterates the old argument that rabbits are vermin. Being committed for four months for "night pose soton of "game," he respectfully informs the presiding justice that at the time of his capture the sun had risen an hour, and that for "day poaching" the law does not allow more than half the sentence just passed upon him. The old clerk fumbles for his horn spectacles, and, after turning over a Justices' Manual, olomnly informs the bench that defendants in his interpretation is right. The poacher remembers this little incident, and chuckles over it.

known to the poacher, and out of this trait he makes capital. He takes under his arm agme cock fitted with artificial spars. These are attached to the natural ones, are sharp as needles, and the bird is trained how to use them. Upon the latter's crowing, one or more cock pheasants immediate ly respond and advance to meet the adversary. A single blow usually suffices to lay low the pride of the pheasant, and in this way half a dozen birds may be taken, while the poacher's bird remains unhurt.

The most ingenious plan adopted by poachers' however, is also one of the most successful. If time and opportunity offer there is scarcely any limit to the depradritions which it allows. A number of dried peas are taken and steamed in boiling water a hole is then made through the center within a needle or some sharp instrument, and through this a stiff bristle is threaded, and the peasant extent and state program of the most and are greedily exten. JUSTICE IN THE FAR WEST.

A California Judge Fines Himself $50 for Appearing on the Street Drunk.

Judge Alexander Laidlaw, of Oakland, is its "form." As puss goes away down the turnip rig, he notes her every twist and double, and takes in the minutest details. He is careful to examine the "smoots" and gates through which she passes, and these spots he always approaches laterally. He leaves no scent of hand nor print of foot, and does not disturb the herbage. All this with a view to his silent work. After this it need hardly be said that the intelligent poacher is always a naturalist. The signs of wind and weather he knows, as it were, poacher is always a naturalist. The signs of wind and weather he knows, as it were, by heart, and this is essential to his silent trade. The rise and wane of the moon, the rain-bringing tides, the local migrations of birds—these and a hundred other things are marked in his unwritten calendar.
